

Dollar volatility, despite dearth of US data

The dollar experienced some volatility last week. With the US government still in 'shutdown' mode, as well as a quiet macro data calendar elsewhere, it meant that the escalation of US/China trade tensions very much dominated the market news. The greenback was reactive to the ebb and flow of the newsflow regarding these tensions. Some less confrontational language from the White House earlier in the week provided support to the dollar, reflected in EUR/USD trading to a low of $1.154 and USD/JPY regaining the ¥152 threshold. Overall though, the trade related newsflow tended to play out as more dollar 'negative' than 'positive' over the course of the week.

The currency was also not helped by dovish leaning comments from several Fed speakers, including Fed Chair Powell. Meanwhile, concerns over the performance/credit risk of some US regional banks towards the end of the week was also a headwind for the currency. Elsewhere, in terms of the majors, the euro got some marginal support from the French PM Lecornu surviving two no-confidence votes. From a yen perspective, there appeared to be some progress in the government/coalition negotiations. Aggregating all of the above, the dollar starts this week holding a modestly softer tone from where it started last Monday. This is evident in EUR/USD operating in the upper half of $1.16-1.17, USD/JPY below ¥151 and GBP/USD above $1.34. Meantime, the action in EUR/GBP has remained contained within a narrow 86.6p-87.3p range.

Looking ahead to this week, US/China trade developments will remain in focus and therefore continue to be a potential directional driver for the dollar. Data-wise, the US macro diary remains impacted by the 'shutdown' but US CPI inflation (Sept) is due to be released. The flash PMIs for October from the US, Eurozone and UK will provide an early read on how these economies performed at the start of Q4.
